TEACHING EXPERIENCE

Philosophy of Teaching and Learning

I believe that teaching is most beneficial to students (and instructors) when students actively participate in their own learning. I view the classroom as a safe setting in which students learn to think critically and to apply their newfound knowledge to different facets of their lives. I expose students to current research and teach them valuable skills that assist them in analyzing research studies and findings. In order to make research more applicable and exciting to them, I emphasize the connection between research, policy, and practice. Finally, I believe that students learn and demonstrate their knowledge in a multitude of ways. As a result, I incorporate various methods of instruction (e.g., lecture, discussion, and group activities) to address different learning styles, and I employ a variety of assessment techniques (e.g., exams, in-class writing assignments, research papers, and presentations) in order to evaluate students' knowledge and abilities.
